ARM BONE

Taken From the Tomb of the Great Charlemagne

The German Emperor pats himself on the back as the only living man possessed of relics of Charlenagne, but the Empress Eugenie, when last in Paris, exhibited a whole arm bone of the great French-German Emperor. And William got only a tooth and some pieces of cloth.

Masson, who wrote so many interesting tales of the first Napoleon and his family, said to The Courier-Journal correspondent: "Eugenie inherited the Charlemagne relics from her husband, the third Napoleon, and the latter got them from Eugene and Hortense, the great Emperor's stepchildren. These, again, found the relics in a disused jewel casket, formerly owned by their mother, Empress Josephine. They had been forgotten for quite a while.

"This is how Josephine acquired the famous relics. Napoleon made Berdolet, a French prelate, who consented to recognize the new constitution, Bishop Aix-la-Chapelle. Consequently, when Josephine, in the summer of 1804, went there to take the waters, His Grace was most assiduous in his attentions to the Empress. Josephine had but to breathe the word and the Bishop opened for her the treasury of the famous cathedral and the grave of Charlemagne itself. The Empress had the pick of the relics and objects of art in the treasury. When she saw the body of Charles, whom Napoleon was wont to call "his great ancestor," she asked for a piece of it, and the Bishop gave her a whole arm. He also took from the corpse's breast a jeweled medallion containing some bair from the head of Mary. But news of this grave robbery was suppressed for a long time and leaked out only by installments after Cardinal Carrara, against the wishes of the Pope, had authorized the use of Napoleon's new Catechism, which added an eleventh commandment to the ten, namely, that everybody must obey the Emperor Napoleon in everything. The medallion containing Mary's hair is now in the possession of the Ducal family of Leuchtenberg, descendants of Eugene, who intermarried with the Russian imperial family.
